Apple, Foxconn raise alarm over equipment delays at Chinese ports, seek government help

Apple and Foxconn India have sought the government's intervention over delays in shipment of specialised manufacturing equipment from Chinese ports. While production remains unaffected for now, prolonged delays could hinder Apple’s manufacturing expansion plans in India, sources said. If China escalates such actions, it could create significant challenges for India's handset and electronics industry, which is focusing on component manufacturing to strengthen its capabilities, one of the sources cited above said. “Shipments of specialised manufacturing equipment meant for India have been held up in China ports for several months. Government officials at the IT ministry have been informed about this issue,” the source told Moneycontrol. “Factories need new machinery for trial runs of new iPhone models yearly. This could translate into a serious issue.”
